

Thank you for taking the time to read and acknowledge our ideas. A change I would like to see at Perry High School is, More teachers that help and support kids that come from an uncomfortable environment.

By this I mean helping kids who come from families that have been through trauma and kids that just need extra motivation in school or just someone to talk to. Some things the school has already done to help this situation is bringing guidance counselors, a social worker, and support staff to assist students who speak English as a second language into the school so kids can go talk to them whenever needed.

Some things that would also be done with bringing more teachers in is, Teachers going to the student at an appropriate time and place when they need help but won't go because they are too nervous or embarrassed. About 8 percent of today's U.S. teens suffer from some type of diagnosed anxiety disorder, according to the National Institute of Mental Health. And anxiety has been on the rise among children and young adults since at least the 1950s. Doing this for the school will help kids and young adults feel less pressured and feel more comfortable talking about what they need help with.
